1. Presentation

This is the third scientific report of IBEI, listing all the research activities carried on at the institute in 2014 and 2015. The evidence presented confirms IBEI's ability to obtain a significant part of its income from competitive research funds, both nationally and internationally. This is about 20 per cent of IBEI's total budget, a percentage that has been relatively stable in recent years, in spite of the economic crisis and the reduction of research support in Spain since 2011. In particular, IBEI has been able to attract a significant number of young and talented scholars, who have obtained support from different sources, like Marie Curie or Ramon y Cajal programmes, among others. They are contributing to the increase in the number of research staff, to achieve a critical mass, and they are helping to promote the international visibility of the institute.

During this period, IBEI researchers have been actively involved in many areas concerning international relations and politics. They have focused on analysing and understanding significant problems in the international arena, ranging from European politics and policies to the role of international organisations and the dynamics of globalisation in our current world, among many others. As an inter-university research institute of the public universities in the Barcelona area, IBEI has a robust commitment to expanding its research activities in international studies, aiming to contribute from Barcelona to the global scientific debates, being also an agora that reverberates these debates among its graduate students and the professional community involved in issues concerning international relations. From the output data reported, it is possible to observe a progressive consolidation of research at the institute. Increasingly, the institute has become an important venue for scientific workshops and conferences among scholarly networks in Europe and beyond; most relevant, however, is the continual increase in the number of papers published by IBEI members in high-impact journals, as the figures for the year 2015 acknowledge.

In July 2015, the IBEI Board of Patrons approved a new strategic plan for the institute, which delineates the main strategies in research and teaching to be implemented until 2020. The plan advocates strengthening relations between research and teaching at the institute, and introducing new initiatives, for example training and involving students more deeply in current research projects at the institute. In addition, IBEI's new location since September 2014, at the Research Park of the Universitat Pompeu Fabra in Ciutadella Campus, is a better environment for the intensification of research activities, with the possibility of hosting more visiting fellows or expanding the number of workshops and seminars. It is also the aim of the plan, and a challenge for IBEI, to articulate progressively a larger research community at IBEI, involving both affiliated senior professors from Barcelona's universities and our own faculty members who combine graduate teaching with their research responsibilities.

2.2 Research Programmes

IBEI's research programmes aim to produce new scientific knowledge, preferably knowledge of a general kind. It also intends to disseminate this by means of the publication of its researchers' contributions in the international academic community's usual channels. Our goal is to define certain research programmes that are both attractive and flexible enough to allow the integration of different viewpoints, avoiding concentration on specific disciplines and/or very precise theoretical problems and study areas. The aim is to seek complementarities with the research carried out at the universities linked to IBEI, while also identifying areas in which there may be major potential for achieving high levels of quality and opportunity in the future.

The research programmes are structured around relevant matters with a transversal nature in the international sphere. It includes a theoretical focus and considers the dynamics of actors and institutions from a general viewpoint as well as the relationship between domestic problems and the global scenario. Therefore, the research programmes are not grouped according to regional areas, but are structured to include interdisciplinary themes and concerns; the aim of this is to facilitate dialogue and joint reflection among researchers.

Global Governance

Programme coordinator: Nico Krisch

'Global governance' captures the changing patterns in which common problems are dealt with in today's increasingly interdependent world. Building on classical multilateral forms of cooperation, it encompasses today a bewildering array of actors and institutions. Public and private actors, formal and informal institutions, intergovernmental and transnational forms of regulation interact in an often uncoordinated, sometimes competitive, and typically highly complex structure. In this environment, many of the ways in which government and law have traditionally been enabled and hedged, both on the domestic and on the international plane, are growing less effective, but alternative controls are emerging only slowly.

The research programme on global governance seeks to understand the shape of global governance, its changing legal and normative framework as well as accountability mechanisms as they are adapting to the changing institutional landscape. It is particularly interested in the authority structures of global governance, in the norms that come to complement or replace traditional consent-based forms of legitimation, and in the ways in which different regimes and layers of law interact. The research programme is driven by a guiding interest in how, in the complex context of global governance, ideals of self-government are being, and can be, realized.

Research fields

- International institutions and their governance structures
- Actors and networks in global regulatory governance
- Forms of global authority
- The legitimacy of global law
- Constitutional interfaces between regimes in global governance
- Popular sovereignty in the global order

Networks and Institutions in a Globalized Economy

Programme coordinator: Juan Díez Medrano

The aim of this research programme is to analyse the political and social context created by the acceleration of globalisation processes from the last decade of the 20th century onwards, and which is still occurring, including the intensification of trade integration processes at an international level and the dynamics of the new regionalism.

This programme's main themes are: the transformation and strengthening of state political institutions; the behaviour of the national political, social and economic actors in this new environment with highly globalised dynamics; and analysis of the interdependence that occurs among countries and which accelerates changes in institutions and public policies.

From the point of view of political economy, a central concern of this programme is the changes in the composition and comparative strengths of the different actors participating in the creation of public institutions and policies, whether national or transnational. The need to study and debate economic growth and democratic consolidation processes is proposed, especially for the developing world. An important consideration is the transformation of both the structures of interests and the actors' preferences as the result of the above-mentioned globalisation and integration processes.

Finally, this research programme studies the characteristics of the institutional innovations and new public policies, their impact on national societies and the mechanisms of their international spread. Special emphasis is placed on the new political, economic and financial institutions arising from globalisation processes and the political, economic and financial responses triggered.

Research fields

- The dynamics and politics of development
- The impacts of regional integration processes
- The transnationalisation of economic activities
- The spread of policies and institutions
- Democracy, States and growth

Security, Power and Multilateralism in a Global World

Programme coordinator: Esther Barbé

The last two decades have created a “new” security agenda, which incorporates problems of global scope (energy and environmental risks, transnational crime, global terrorism, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, massive population movements) that mutually reinforce both each other and traditional problems (armed conflicts, persistent poverty).

From the viewpoint of International Relations, the analysis of security is intrinsically linked to the distribution and exercise of power at an international level.

The system’s unipolarism, based on the United States’ military capacity, together with the “war on terror”, has attracted the attention of politicians and analysts in recent years. In this programme, the exercise of power as a social relation in today’s global world deserves a much more detailed analysis, one that incorporates institutional, structural and regulatory dimensions. This involves going into the analysis of the role played by different actors (emerging powers, the European Union, social movements) and by new principles (the responsibility to protect), which involve a challenge to the basis of the state system (national sovereignty). That is why human security now occupies a central role on political agendas.

“Passportless problems” in terms of security have given place to a broad consensus around the need for multilateral responses. For this programme, multilateralism, as an institutional form that coordinates interstate relations with regard to security based on common principles, presents a number of research questions related both to its effectiveness and its legitimacy in the 21st century.

Research fields:

- Multilateral security institutions
- Construction of the global security agenda
- Conflict management and prevention
- Fragile state, globalisation and armed conflict
- The European Union in the security sphere

TRANSCRISIS–Enhancing the EU’s Transboundary Crisis Management Capacities: Strategies for Multi–Level Leadership

The European Union (EU) is facing the daunting prospect of transboundary crises: threats that escalate across national borders and policy domains. EU member states must collaborate to address these crises. EU governance can play a pivotal role in facilitating a joint response. But does the EU have the institutional leadership capacities to deal with transboundary crises? The response to the financial crisis – a textbook example of a transboundary crisis – revealed deep problems with crisis leadership, including conflicting diagnoses, regulatory gaps, unclear political jurisdictions and responsibilities, a lack of problem solving capacity, and blame-shifting. Growing euroscepticism has been directly related to the EU’s role during this transboundary crisis. This project outlines the institutional requirements for effective and legitimate crisis leadership in the face of transboundary crisis. We define crisis leadership as a set of strategic management functions, including the detection of impending threats, the collection and sharing of information, the coordination of partners, and the communication to the public about the crisis and the response. The project analyses the capacities of political leaders in EU institutions and member states to fulfill these leadership functions. It will pinpoint the existing and required capacities to support these functions. It investigates the crisis management capacities of individual political leaders, and EU institutions. It explores the effects of political leadership on the member state level and studies how crisis management capacity is exercised in various policy sectors. The project will result in recommendations for effective and legitimate crisis leadership. It establishes a ‘crisis management capital index’ that allows for an evidence-based assessment. It proposes strategies to build support for transboundary crisis management in a multilevel system, reconnecting citizens with an idea of what the EU can do for them.

bEUcitizen– All Rights Reserved? Barriers Towards European Citizenship

The European Court of Justice expects European citizenship to become the fundamental status of nationals of the Member States. It lies at the heart of the European integration process. The treaties, legislation, and case law have given Europeans an increasing number of rights. Yet the European Commission complains that these remain underused. Therefore, it has included in FP7 a call for a large-scale IP, identifying and analysing barriers to exercising such European citizenship rights.

Utrecht University is initiating a response to this call. In its project proposal it identifies research questions and several categories of potential hindrances as answers to some of them: contradictions between different rights, multilevel rights, and differences in priorities Member States accord these rights; differences in political, administrative, and legal institutions; financial restraints; lack of sufficient solidarity; administrative and bureaucratic hurdles; language problems; and other practical barriers to claiming and exercising rights - and related duties. Furthermore we distinguish citizenship rights by the types of rights - economic, social, political, and civil - and by the ascribed characteristics of the subjects of these rights: male and female, young and old, native and immigrant.

We believe multidisciplinary will help in identifying and analysing barriers to the exercise of European citizenship. We can learn from other times and places; therefore we add a historical and comparative dimension to the analysis. And we aim to combine insights from the historical, legal, and social sciences. Overall we want to investigate the options for a multi-layered citizenship true to the EU's motto 'In Varie-tate Concordia'.

EUCROSS–The Europeanisation of Everyday Life: Cross–Border Practices and Transnational Identities among EU and Third–Country Citizens

The EUCROSS project examines the relationship between the manifold activities of EU residents (nationals, mobile EU citizens, and third-country nationals) across the borders of nation states and their collective identities. Specifically, the project will:

- 1) map out individuals' cross-border practices as an effect of European integration and globalisation;
- 2) assess the impact of these practices on collective identifications (also controlling for the inverse causal process).

Which cross-border practices are more likely to foster some form of identification with the EU – e.g., contacts with foreign friends and/or unwanted foreigners, periods of labour mobility abroad, buying property abroad, business and tourist travel, or consumer relations with international companies? Under which contextual and individual conditions do these experiences promote a higher sensitivity to 'Europe' – rather than the 'local' or the 'global' – as an identity catalyst? Which social groups are more prone to adopt a European mindset in the wake of the Europeanisation of everyday life? To disentangle empirically the factors and mechanisms that link together the cross-border practices facilitated by European integration, globalisation and/or other dimensions of collective identity, we adopt a two-stage, mixed quantitative/qualitative approach. In the first stage, we will carry out a quantitative survey among nationals, intra-EU movers (Romanian citizens) and third-country nationals (Turkish citizens) who reside in six European countries (Denmark, Germany, Italy, Romania, Spain and the United Kingdom). In the second stage, we will interrogate, via in-depth interviews, the meaning given by individuals to cross-border practices, their collective identifications, and the role that the European Union, globalisation, and the nation play in these personal narratives, among a select typology of respondents to the quantitative survey.

GLOBALDEMOS–The Struggle for Global Justice and Development. The Role of the European Union in a World of Competing Regionalisms

Understanding the significance of global development and its impact on global justice is vital for the disciplines of International Relations, Politics, International Political Sociology and International Development. For this reason our proposal takes an interdisciplinary approach by drawing upon recent contributions made by political science, international political economy, sociology, and law, while combining conceptual and empirical social science. Specifically, the project explores and evaluates the expansion, diffusion and importance of social policy regulation, provision and empowerment processes that occur at the regional tier of governance. Despite the resurgence of regionalism and intraregional relations since the late 1980s and the resilience of regional institutions during and after the economic crises of the late 1990s and mid-2000s, little research has provided sustained and comparative analyses of these institutions and initiatives, and their impact on global justice and governance. Given the changing power configurations and the rise of regional powers that challenge the more normative global governance scripts, this issue demands closer examination to understand state-market relationships, the meaning of international development and global justice itself.

The research will thus make an original contribution by bringing together for the first time three traditionally separate research strands in the social sciences: regionalism, regulation and development. Moreover, it will reveal how and to what extent the articulation of these regional initiatives shape the development space via the provision of public goods otherwise unattainable by national governments that rely on often very limited regulatory capacities [Braithwaite 2006]. Building on, but seeking to go beyond the European Union (EU) experience, this is backed by a detailed comparative analysis of regional blocs in Africa, Asia and Latin America to illustrate the re-emergence of the region as a unit to mitigate the negative effects of market instability derived from globalisation [Telò 2001; Beeson 2007], but also as development space for managing uncertainties through social regulation and provision [Yeates and Deacon 2006; Deacon et al. 2009] and contesting global criteria. The project will focus on social policy regulation and provision in trade and development, gender equality, education, health and labour. The general objective of the project is thus to develop a theoretically and empirically integrative approach to the analysis of the (cross) regional interaction in the area of social policy, and its impact on global justice and governance. To the extent that these regional regulatory processes have to be apprehended within the global context where they attempt to insert, convergence and competition across regions are also relevant factors to consider. Based on an in-depth analysis of the new forms of regional cooperation in the Global South, the project will then explore the role and the extent to which EU policies and institutions involved in the promotion of a just global order can contribute to or hinder the deepening of these regional dynamics. The research will thus explore the bridging initiatives and mutual impact of intersection points between EU and South-South cooperation.

WAYSOUT–Rules of Disengagement: Individual and Collective Ways Out of Terrorism in Spain

Little is known about why the users of terrorism abandon their violent strategy. Research has focused on the motivations for engaging in terrorism rather than on the motivations for renouncing terrorism. Yet a number of protracted campaigns have ended by the deliberate decision of participants. This research project aims at identifying the individual, material and societal incentives for giving up terrorism in the Spanish context.

For example, is the counter-terrorist effort the most significant variable behind a process of terrorist disengagement? Do groups that abandon violence come to the realisation that terrorism has failed or do they perceive new opportunities for achieving their political objectives through peaceful means? Do terrorist groups and individuals follow a simple logic of cost-benefit analysis? What leads individuals to accept offers of reduced prison sentences or amnesties? Is the decision to renounce terrorism the result of an individual or a group process? How do terrorists perceive the government's counter-recruitment strategy?

This research project will examine terrorist disengagement in three ethno-nationalist groups – Euskadi Ta Askatasuna - Militar (ETA-m) Euskadi Ta Askatasuna Político-Militar (ETA-pm) and Terra Lliure – in order to identify the mechanisms that facilitate abandonment, defection, decline or defeat. The present multi-level research project seeks to examine processes of disengagement from violent groups: (1) from the reasons why individuals decide to leave an organisation (micro level); (2) to the internal dynamics of such groups (meso level); and (3) effect of counter-terrorist policy on precipitating such disbandment (macro level). Overall, the project will provide an analysis of how Spain dealt with groups employing political violence and terrorism, and what lessons can be learned from these experiences that can be applied to future counterterrorism campaigns.

ACCOUNTREG–The Political Economy of Regulatory Agencies: Accountability, Transparency and Effectiveness

The rise and diffusion of regulatory agencies during the 1990s has enthroned a particular institutional model of state bureaucracy: the regulatory state. Based on autonomy, independence, and expertise as fundamental elements to the improvement of policy outcomes and economic efficiency, numerous regulatory agencies were established to regulate multiple sectors, including economic and social issues, in countries showing diverse administrative traditions. While democratic legitimacy has been traditionally entwined with accountability, the complex patterns of governance today make it increasingly difficult to determine who is responsible for and how to hold them accountable. Accountability has thus become a far-reaching concern for institutions, being this especially marked in the case of regulatory agencies. Moreover, the independence and autonomy of regulatory agencies raises the problem of accountability.

Moving beyond normative frameworks, this research project will empirically analyze the potential of regulatory agencies for political accountability. Taking accountability as a social relation between the agency and its forum, which includes an heterogeneous array of actors and organizations, the study aims to fulfill the following objectives:

- 1) To map and assess the transparency and access to information mechanisms of regulatory agencies in a comparative perspective, both in sectoral and national terms;
- 2) To assess the relations of cooperation and conflict between politicians, public servants, professionals, businessmen, and other stakeholders in the context of regulatory governance;
- 3) To better understand the policy communities around regulatory agencies, with a particular focus on their forum, their argumentation, and dialogue and justification dynamics;
- 4) To identify which accountability mechanisms are relevant for the effectiveness of regulatory agencies, as they foster a learning process within both the agency and the broader community.

EUIANUS–The EU in an Unsettled International System: Crisis, Polarity and Multilateralism

As a number of strategic documents illustrate, the promotion of the European vision of global governance, particularly in regard to multilateralism, has become a centrepiece of the European Union's (EU) external policy. Also in Spain the strengthening of global governance through multilateral institutions forms an important part of the foreign policy consensus. However, both the structures of the international system and the European integration project are currently experiencing rapid and unpredictable changes which have made evident the Union's difficulties to carry out its policies on the international stage. Due to its alleged characteristics of being "multipolar without multilateralism" this stage is considered to be problematic for the Europeans. The ongoing economic and financial crisis only has enhanced the problems the EU is facing.

The project EU-IANUS aims to develop a conceptual framework for the systematic analysis of the changes in the international system and the European integration process in four main areas in which the EU has become an international actor: Trade and Finance, Energy and Environment, Security and Defence Policy, and Human and Social Rights. Based on this framework, the project will explain the variations between the roles played by the EU in these four areas. More specifically, the analysis will distinguish between three possible types of European roles in global governance: (I) the EU as a "model" for global governance, (II) the EU as one of the "negotiators" of rules and norms of global governance, and (III) the EU as an "instrument" of international institutions that set the rules and norms of global governance. In addition to the identification of European roles, the project seeks to examine the methods, mechanisms and practices that enable the EU to exercise these roles under particular circumstances.

Finally, the rigorous, systematic and comprehensive study of the role of the EU in global governance will enable a cutting-edge analysis of its role as an effective and legitimate actor in different settings in the international arena. In particular, comparisons will be drawn with other key players such as the United States and various emerging powers (Brazil, Russia, India and China). In practical terms, the research will, grounded in scientific methods, contribute to the development of concrete proposals for the reinforcement of the principle of multilateralism in a changing and increasingly uncertain global governance system.

INTER-Interest Groups in Spain: Participation in the Governmental and Parliamentary Arena

The main purpose of this research project is to promote a comprehensive theoretical and empirical understanding of the role that interest groups play in the Spanish political system. Specifically we will examine interest groups mobilization across different policy venues and time, and the strategies they use to influence political decision making. For decades, political scientists have described the policy making as a process that takes place within closed policy communities characterized by the participation of few interest organizations that exchange information and resources vis-à-vis governmental actors, with high levels stability and control of the political agenda. Existing case studies in Spain and other advanced democracies illustrate how in most policy areas there are policy communities, which exhibit both stability and exclusiveness of access across time. Our goal is to test empirically whether this pattern of interest groups participation can be generalized across policy subsystems, and to what extent there are variations of across time.

To do that, we will develop a comprehensive database about the mobilization of interest groups in the governmental and parliamentarian arena from 1986 to 2011 in Spain. More specifically, we will analyze all the appearances (comparecencias) of interest groups in the Spanish Parliament, and all the collegiate bodies (órganos colegiados) through which the Spanish government formally interacts with interest organizations for the discussion of policy issues. With this database we will map out which organized interests have access to the governmental and parliamentary arenas, and how participation varies across policy issues and across time.

This database is also a fundamental tool to analyze why participation of interest groups has changed over time. More specifically, we test whether changes in the participation of interest groups are related to regulatory reforms involving the entry of new ideas and ways of thinking about problems as the agenda setting approach would predict; and whether increasing delegation of political authority towards the EU and CCAA has altered the pattern of mobilization of interest groups in the parliamentary and governmental arena. Finally, we test to what extent formal access to the governmental and parliamentary arenas is important to explain the ability of interest groups to influence policy outcomes. To answer these questions we will also go into an in-depth analysis of ten issues, selected according to the methodology of the Intereuro research project. For each issue, we identify the policy positions of all the interest organizations involved in the policy making process. From here we assess which policy positions are taken into account in the final policy decisions.

With this research project we will cover the lack of systematic data about the role of interest groups in the Spanish political system, going beyond case studies; we will test empirically existing hypothesis developed by different approaches, and at the same time will try to make a theoretical contribution about the ability of interest groups to influence policy outcomes in a new context of multilevel governance. By using the same methodology as two other international research projects, we will be able to contribute to the internationalization of research communities, and compare the case of Spain with other EU countries and the US. Finally, we create a new tool about interest groups mobilization that will be available in the future for all scholars.

INDIMOVE– Ethnic Politics and Development: A Comparative Analysis of Indigenous Movements in Argentina, Brazil, and Chile

Over recent decades Latin America has witnessed a dramatic sea change. Indigenous people became a formidable political force, something unthinkable even a generation ago. These movements demand equal rights to overcome longstanding inequalities, and push for special rights that recognize ethnic and cultural differences and secure political and territorial autonomy.

What is the significance of indigenous mobilization for democratic citizenship? What are the consequences of indigenous movements for inequality and poverty? Currently, we lack systematic answers to those questions. Remarkably little attention has been paid on how these new politics of identity are connected to developmental outcomes.

This project will fill in these knowledge gaps. It draws on comparative case studies of indigenous activism around land rights in Argentina, Chile, and Brazil. The research has three major objectives. First, it develops an innovative framework that integrates the analysis of causes and consequences of indigenous movements. Second, it investigates how and why the strategies and intensity of indigenous movements varies. Third, it explores how distinct forms of indigenous mobilization transform the implementation of citizenship and alter dominant conceptions of poverty and inequality. These objectives are pursued by using a qualitative methodology that combines protest event-analysis from local newspapers and semi-structured interviews with indigenous activists, non-activists, state officials, and economic elites.

GREI–International Studies Research Group

As a research group, the GREI came together during 2008 under the auspices of the IBEI, first with the recognition as emerging research group in 2009, and later as consolidated research group in 2014. The subjects for study by the group members combine the academic traditions and perspectives of international political economy with those of international relations. The main area for the research group to focus on is a wide set of global problems regarding politics and international development, with the study of international governance processes being tackled transversely. In this way, the group members consider, among other matters, the political economy of the States in the context of globalisation, the role of the multilateral institutions, and the networks of actors present in the international sphere or in the processes of interaction among countries and the effects on their public policies.

OBS– European Foreign Policy Observatory

The European Foreign Policy Observatory was founded as a research group in 2001 with the aim of promoting and increasing knowledge and debate about the European Union's foreign policy. The objective is to consolidate it as a group, raise the visibility of its scientific work (use of the new technologies, website), the education of young researchers, the group's internationalisation (work in European research networks) and the creation of a major joint body of scientific work. In 2009 and 2014 the group was recognized as consolidated research group.

Comparative Policy Agendas

The Spanish Policy Agendas Project is aimed to contribute to the analysis of issue prioritization and policy dynamics in Spain from transition to democracy to present. The main goal is to identify the variations of the list of problems that are object of important attention within the Spanish political system; and to give an explanation of why these variations occur, to what extent issue politicization follows public preferences, and how policy actors –especially mass-media– contribute to explain variations in the prioritization of issues across time.

At present, we are working on five different areas of analysis: (1) the interaction between the political agenda, the media and public opinion, (2) political representation and quality of democracy in multilevel systems of governance, (3) Europeanization of the political agenda and patterns of policy convergence across countries and time; (4) gender and public policy and (5) the mobilization of interest organizations. Our analysis is based on the development of large datasets, which allow combining qualitative and quantitative methods for the analysis of policy dynamics across time, countries and policy subsystems. These databases have been developed following the methodology of the Comparative Policy Agendas Project: an international network of scholars from USA, Canada and several European countries Belgium, Denmark, France, Israel, Italy, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, and the UK.

Cátedra Telefónica de Política y Regulación de las Telecomunicaciones e Internet América Latina - Europa

The Cátedra Telefónica de Política y Regulación de las Telecomunicaciones e Internet has been created to facilitate telecommunications and Internet policy benchmarking between Europe and Latin America.

The goals are: to discuss about telecommunications and Internet policy in Europe and Latin America; to produce working papers that deal with the main regulatory models trends and evolution; to Exchange ideas and good practices in ICT policies through visiting research programme for Latin American Researchers; to create a knowledge platform in touch with the experts in the field.

Areas: Telecommunications and Internet Policy between Europe and Latin America; Regulation and Regulatory Models in Europe and Latin America; The creation of Supranational and Transnational Regulatory Spaces in Europe and Latin America.
